A dog at Worth, Ga., which had a habit of going deer bunting alone, was chained to a block of wood just large enough to keep him from running. One day he was missed, and serich being made his bay was heard in the woods. The master went to the spot, bat the dog was not to be seen, yet his bay was heard several hundred yards further on. The dog barked only two or three times. When the owner arrived at where he supposed the dog to be he heard him still further on. This was kept up for some time till finally the owner caught up with him, saw the dog lay the block on the ground, bark three times, take the block up in his mouth again and move along on the trail. The dag was trailing a deer, and carried the block in his mouth, except when it paused to let its master know where it was.

About 10 30 on the morning following her interview with Ham Coetzee, Jees was at "The Palatial" as usual, and Johr. was just finishing packing the cart with such few goods as they possessed. "Yes, of course I have, exercise is good for the young" And then he laughed, and she laughed too

It was all nothing—nothing at all—but somehow it was very delightful. Certainly mutual affection, even when unaxpressed, has a way of making things go happily, and can find something so laugh at any where.

Just then, who should come up but Mrs. Neville, in a great plate of excitenent, and, as usual, framing herself with her hat, prisoners have come in, and I heard one of the Boers in charge say that he had a passigned by the Boer general for some English people and that he was coming over to see about them presently. Who can it be?

"It is us," and Jess, quickly. "We are going bome I saw Hans Coetzes, restorday, and begged him to try and get us a pass, and I suppose he has."

"My word! going to get out! Well, you are lockly. Let me at down and write a letter to my great uncle at the Cape. You must post it when you can. He is 44 and rather soft, but I dare say in will like to hear from me," and she bund ed off into the house to give her aged relative (who, by the way, labored under the impression that she was still a little girl of 4 years of agel as minute on account of the sege of Pretons. as time would allow. Well, John, you had better tell Mouti to

"Mooth," sand John to the Zulu, who was longing around in a way characteristic of that intelligent but unindustrions race, "in span the horses. We are going bact to Moot fonten."

"Kéos" (chief), sand the Zulu unconsernedly, and started on the criand as though it were the most every day occurrence to drive off home out of a closely beleaguered town. That is another beauty of the Zalu race, you can not astomish them. They, no doubt, consider that that, to them, outrinor linary mixture of wisdom and insanity, the white right, is, as the agnostic French critic said in despair of the prophet Zarubha.ed, "capable do tout."

Join stood and watched the inspanning absently. The fact was that he, too, was conscious of a sensation of regret. He felt ashumed of bimself for it, but there it was, he was sorry to leave the place. For the last week or so he had been living in a dream, and everything outside that dream was blurred and indistinct as a andscape in a fog. He knew the things were there but he did not quite uppreciate their relative size and position. The only real ling was his dream, and cleave as a vegrue as loce for of records, and

And now there would be an ond of dream And now there would be an end of dreaming the fog would lift and he must face the facts. I sess, with whom he had I reamed, would go away to Europe and he would marry Bessie, and all this Protoria business would glide away in, of the pist like a watch in the night. Well, it must be so, and he for one was not going to finish from his duty, but he would have been more than himsa had he not felt the pang of awakening. It was all so very unfortunate. By this time Mouth had got the horses up, and asked if he was to inspan.

'Not want a bit "said John" 'Very likely it is all rot," he added to humself.

Scarcely were the words out of his mouth scarcely were the words out of his mouth when he caught sight of two armed Boers of a peculiarly unpleasant type and rough appearance riding across the viidt toward "The Palatial" gate, escorted by four carlineers. At the gate they stopped, and one of them dismounted and came up to where he

To this the Boer demurred, but finally, after going to the grate to consult his companion, consented, and the two rode back to the headquarter carry, asying that they would wait for the cart there, whereupon the horses were inspanied. In five minutes even viting was ready and the cart was standing in the roadway in front of the hittle gate. After he had looked to all the straps and buckles and seen that everything was properly packed, John went to call Jess. He four the retaining by the doorsteps, looking out at her favorite view. Her hand was places, sideways against her forcheaf, as though to shade her eyes from the sun. But where she was standing there was no sun, and John could not help guessing why she was shalling ser eyes. She was crying at leaving the place in that quick, harrowing sort of way that some women have, that is to say, a few hig tears were rolling down there face. John felt a lump rise in his own throat at the sight, and very naturally relieved his feelings in rough language. "What the deuce are you after?" he asked "Are you going to keep the horses standing all day?"

and Mouti was scrambling up behind.
"Don't cry, old girl," said John, laying his hand upon her shoulder "What can't be cured must be endured"
"Yes. John" ch.

At the headquarter camp John went in and At first the officer who was temporarily in command—the commandant having been wounded at the same time that John was wounded at the same time that John was— rather demurred to his going, especially when he learned that he had passed his word not to carry dispatches. Presently, however he thought better of it, and said he supposed that it was all right, as he could not see that their going could do the garrison any harm; 'rather the reverse, in fact, because you can tell the people how we are getting on in this

God forsaken hole I only wish that sembody would give me a pass, that's all," whereupon John shock hands with him and left, to find an engar crowd gathered outside.

The news of their going had got abread, and overybody was running down to hear the truth of it. Such an event as a departure out of Pretoria had not happened for a couple of months and more, and the excitement was proportionate to its novelty proportionate to its novelty
"I say, Niel, is it true you are going?" hallcoed out a burly farmer

halloced out a burly farmer

"How the deuce did you get a pass?" put in another man with a face like a wease! He was what is known as a "Boer vernuker" (literally a "Boer cheater"), that is, a traveling trader whose business it is to beguile he simple muided Dutchman by selling them worthless goods at five times their cast. "I have loads of friends among the Bbers There is hardly a Boer in the Transwall who does not know me"—("To his cost," put in a bystander, with a grunt)—"and yet I have tred all I know"—("And you know a good doal," said the same rude man)—"and I can't get a pass."

"You don't suppose those poor Boers are going to let you out when once they have gut you mi! went on the tormentor "Why, man, it's against human nature You've gut all their wool, now do you think they want you to have their skin too!"

Whereupon the wease! faced individual gave a low! of wrath, and pretended to make a rush at the author of these random gutes, waiting half way for somehody to stop him and prevent a breach of the peace

"Oh, Miss Croft' crued out a woman in the crowd, who, like Jess, had been trapped in Pretoria while on a flying visit, "if you can get a line down to my husband at Marriz burg! to tall him that I am well, except for the rheumatism, from sleeping on the wif ground, and tell him to his the twins for me."

"I say, Niel, tell those Boers that we will give them a d—d good hiding yet, when Colley releves us," song out a jolly young Englishman in the uniform of the Pretonia carbineers. He little knew that poor Colley—kind hearted English gentleman that he was—was sleeping pencefully under six feet of ground with a Boar buillet through his bridge.

Now, Capt. Niel, if you are ready, we must trek, said one of the Boers, in Dutch, suiting the action to the word by catching Away started the horses with a plungs, scattering the crowd to the right and left, and aimd a volley of furewells they were off upon than homeward joining.

For more than an hour nothing particular happened. Join drove on at a fan pace, and the two floors cantered nlong bahind. At the end of this time, however, just as they were approaching the fled House, where Frank Muller had obtained the pass from the general on the previous day, one of the Boers rode up and told them, longibly enough, that they were to outspan at the house, where they would get some food. As it was past 10 clock they were by no means sorry to hear this, and would get some food. As it was past I o'clock they were by no means sorry to hear this, and accordingly. John drew up the cart about fifty yards from the place and they proceeded to get the horses out and, having was hed them roll and drink, proceeded to the house. The two floers who had also off saidhed, were already sitting on the versinds, and when Jess looked inquiringly toward them one of them nonited with his pipe toward the fittle room. Taking the hint they entered, had found a Hottentot woman just setting some food upon the table.

John flusted up but took no notice. In deed he thought itsafest not, for to tell the truth he did not much ble the appearance of these two worthes. One of them was a big, smooth, hasty faced mm, with a pecuharly villations expression of countinance and a prominent tooth that projected in glastly villation over his lower hp. The other was a small man, with a sardonic simile and a profusion of black beard and whiskers on his face, and long hair hanging on his shoulders Indeed, when he smiled more vigorously than usual, his ejebrow came down and his whiskers advanced, and his mustache went up till there was scarrely any face left, and he looked more like, a great hearded monkey than a man. This man was a Boer of the wildest type from the far borders of Zoutpansking, and did not understand a word of English. Jess nicknamed him the viktu beeste, from his likeness to that ferocious looking and hany animal. The other man, on the contrary, understood English perfectly, for he had pussed many years of his life in Natal, having left that colony on account of some little andserence has heard in the viktu bear that head brought him into collision with the penul laws. Not content with that he set to work to translate it into Inglish, which took a good time nor was the rendering a very finished one in the result. The Vilderboaste grained sardonically and put in a mous Amen.' and then at last they were allowed to proceed with their dinner, which, on the whole, was not a pleasant one But then they could not expect much pleasure under the circ unstances, so they just and their food and made the lest of a bad job After all, it might have been worse they might have had no dinner to eat.
